My boss has a office, and she has received many, many professional quality business cards. Sadly, she didn't like any of them, so she has been scrambling for a way to replace them. She can't find any place that sells professionally designed business cards with a paper stock that she likes and it's turning into a real pain for her. Her business card design is simple and attractive, but due to the limitations of office-related items like binding and paper cutters, the design needs to be on a piece of trim. The trim needs to be able to be fed in a perfect straight line through the cutter and come out in a perfect straight line, otherwise it doesn't work at all. The paper stock available at most office supply stores are not nearly as perfect as the paper stock you find in photo stores. That is what makes a business card printed with white paper stock look so unattractive. Every single crease, fold, and wrinkle is obvious, and it's a shame. In short, her current problem is that if she prints the entire business
