The degree to which information is actively recalled from long-term memory has traditionally been measured using recall tasks in which participants are given free recall or recognition of the target information. In the current study, the same participants were asked to recall information presented immediately following incidental learning. There was much less forgetting of the information presented during learning when this information was recalled compared with items which did not undergo this kind of retrieval. The effect was observed across a variety of experimental conditions, including eight encoding conditions and five retrieval conditions. There was no significant effect of learning versus repeated study on memory for the target information. Memory performance was similar between participants with high and low verbal IQ.Radioimmunological assay for hCG with heavy Fc-fragment specific antibody. Radioimmunological assays of human chorionic gonadotropin (hCG) were performed in two forms: 1) After binding hCG to a test Fc-antibody, the antibody-bound hCG was reacted with a tracer Fc-antibody which was not binding to the test antibody. 2) After binding a tracer Fc-antibody to the test antibody, the non-binder was removed by a second reaction with a test Fc-antibody to allow for a second reaction of the Fc-antibody with the test antibody in an antibody-hCG complex. When the non-binder was removed by the second reaction, the assay sensitivity was greatly improved when compared to the first assay procedure. There was little difference in sensitivity between the two assays on the basis of the result of the comparison of different standards. When the sensitivity of the assay was improved by removing the non-binder, the specificity for hCG was maintained. The assay was applicable to the detection of hCG in serum of pregnancy and serum of patients with trophoblastic diseases. In an assay with dilutions of hCG, the detection limit was 0.1 IU/ml, and the assay was highly reproducible. best interests of the district.
