However, in the wireless communication system, since the output power of a mobile station should be limited, the system efficiency may deteriorate. The above-mentioned problems occur in both of the multi-carrier system and the single-carrier system. For example, in a wireless communication system of the OFDM (Orthogonal Frequency Division Multiplexing) method, data is first carried on the frequency domain, and then is transmitted on the time domain using OFDM (Optic) modulation/demodulation. In this case, however, when the number of carriers is small, each of the sub-carriers has the same data transmission efficiency, and thus the maximum throughput of the system is not increased. In addition, in this case, since the peak power of a modulated/demodulated signal increases in the time domain, the power consumption of the mobile station may significantly increase. However, in the wireless communication system, since the received power of a signal transmitted from a base station is relatively low in a mobile station, the quality of the signal is significantly deteriorated when the power of a signal of the system is increased. Thus, when the number of carriers is small, the reliability of the communication between the mobile station and the base station may deteriorate. Furthermore, according to the OFDM method, one symbol is constituted of one effective symbol that carries data and a plurality of ineffective symbols that do not carry data and may affect performance of a demodulator. The influence of the ineffective symbols on the performance of the demodulator may be significantly increased when the number of carriers is small. Therefore, when a large-capacity data transmission is performed using the wireless communication system, the number of carriers should be large

We consider the problem of estimating the covariance matrix of the urn probabilities, P, for a stochastic urn scheme whose balls are drawn with replacement. A previously unknown N by N covariance matrix, C, of P is the goal. An efficient algorithm for estimating C for many urns is developed, which has the advantage of being of relatively low complexity but nevertheless is also surprisingly accurate. The performance of the algorithm is benchmarked by comparison to its expectations and to a random sampling technique, M, which also provides a measure of the probability that the algorithm detects the true covariance matrix. Monte Carlo experiments show that in a variety of situations, the estimation algorithm is of practical use.A large extent of walking through the streets of an urban environment is needed to reach a destination. A person's walking speed is important to the pedestrian to reach the destination in a reasonable time, that is to be able to maintain a self-sufficient walking speed. As the person walks faster, the risk of a fall increases. A large extent of walking through the streets of an urban environment is also needed to travel on foot, that is to walk without a vehicle. This travel mode is extremely energy consuming and requires a high-level of planning and timing to be applied. Any error in planning and timing may lead to a wrong route or a wrong direction of travel, causing significant environmental impact and an unnecessarily high energy consumption. Also, many persons have to walk a very large area on a daily basis, such as commute from home to a job, or just a part of a city's
