This invention relates to a method of microdrilling and, more particularly, to a method of microdrilling which provides a very small, precisely shaped hole. 2.

Description of the Prior Art There are a number of different methods presently used in the microdrilling art to form holes having extremely small diameters. One of the methods is commonly referred to as autoclaving and employs a self-sharpening drill, such as that shown in U.S. Pat. No. 3,974,967 to Gilkey. In this case, the drill is repeatedly plunged into a solution of water, heated to boiling, to force cutting edges into the drill. The cutting edges are very hard and sharp. When the drill is removed from the water, the cutting edges are very slightly dull. After drilling a series of holes to a desired depth, the drill is reinserted into the autoclaving solution to sharpen the cutting edges. Another method commonly used in the microdrilling art is referred to as milling. In this process, the drill is slowly rotated in a slurry of a metallic binder, such as a cement or a metal, and an abrasive, such as sand or aluminum oxide, until the desired depth of hole has been achieved. The binder and the abrasive are then removed and the surfaces of the drill are cleaned to remove debris and the binder. The cleaned drill is then sharpened by taking it to a rotary tool sharpener. Such sharpening is time consuming, relatively expensive, and often difficult to control. Other methods such as "electropolishing" and "etching" are expensive and time consuming, particularly if the drill is to be returned to the drill cutter after it has been polished. It is also known in the art to form cutters by electroforming. Electroforming is a process by which a conductive material, such as nickel, is heated to a high temperature (about 1,000.degree. C.), is dipped into a solution of metal, then allowed to cool, thereby producing an ingot of metal which is subsequently refined
