External links Category:Automotive software Category:Engine management software I'm a German-American living and working in Berlin. I love to write about my thoughts on culture, lifestyle, and politics. I'm also a recovering cancer patient. Like most women in my position, I've been asked "why did you get cancer?" or "what are you doing to take care of yourself?" or "what are you going to do about the fact that you're now at a higher risk for developing the disease?" I know these questions are sincere, but I refuse to respond with "because I'm at risk of developing breast cancer." Why? Because I didn't choose to be a cancer patient, and I don't want to be treated like one. Not getting cancer doesn't make me a "cancer survivor." I'm not walking around with the understanding that I had cancer, with the purpose of living each day differently in the afternoon, and, most important, I don't want to be treated differently. When I was first diagnosed with breast cancer, the doctor told me that was fortunate because I had a relatively low chance of developing the disease again. The risk of getting it in the future was small, and I was only a few years away from the average age of breast cancer diagnosis. This was someone else's, because, again, I didn't choose to be a cancer patient. Unfortunately, when I tried to share the good news with others, I started getting the "cancer survivor" treatment. If you haven't talked to a friend recently about your cancer, or perhaps you've tried to talk to your doctor about your situation, you've likely experienced a barrage of questions about your health and life situation. These questions are never really "helpful," because most of the time you have no idea what you're being asked. You start by responding to questions like "how are you feeling?" or "how are you coping?" This person always means answering the questions with questions of your own. How do you feel about your cancer? How are you doing? I'm doing well. You? I'm good. It's too early to tell. How are you coping with the disease?
