The most extensively characterized transient anionic state in solution is the nitrogen oxide ion radical anion. It is characterized by an extremely short life time of approximately 0.25 femtoseconds for aqueous solutions of NO<sub>2</sub>-. Despite the importance of this species, the reaction mechanism of this species remains largely unknown. In this work, a transient absorption spectroscopy experiment was performed to investigate the transient state of the NO<sub>2</sub>- ions in aqueous solution. It was found that the excited state NO<sub>2</sub>- ion dissociates to produce enantiodiscpl state ions and that this enantiodiscpl state ionized to form NO<sub>2</sub>- anions at different pH values in aqueous solution. The transient spectra were modeled by a two-state reaction, and the kinetic analysis yields the rate constant of 595f342e71
