Experts advise: Get rid of delay fee for NHS patients The NHS has been ordered to dramatically reduce the size of its delay target after a new analysis found the huge improvements in patient waiting times were mainly because of reform in the private sector. The watchdog, Monitor, said it was considering recommending that the NHS be unable to set a waiting time target when new data became available and the NHS must only target improvement in key areas such as cancer and heart surgery. It said the NHS needed to lift the bar on waiting times for patients before patients took action to reduce the delay in treatment. It said it would consider a recommendation to this effect if it sees evidence that sufficient progress has been made or there is uncertainty about the evidence. "There are now plenty of reasons to be frustrated about how long patients have to wait for key treatments such as cancer, heart and hip and knee operations,” said Dame Deirdre Hutton, chief executive of the NHS Improvement, which commissioned the report. She called for a “step-change” in NHS action. “We know from our analysis that if we are going to improve patient outcomes, we need to fix the NHS, not water it down. We need to stop drawing down NHS reserves on bureaucracy, making it harder for staff to improve and deliver care.” The hospital inspectorate has traditionally set a target of 95% of operations starting within 18 weeks of referral to all surgery, which falls to 95% for some operations for complex and emergency cases by 18
