Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a reciprocating compressor, in particular, to an oil reservoir for a reciprocating compressor having a function of effectively utilizing lubricating oil by increasing the amount of oil to be discharged into a compressor. 2. Description of the Related Art In general, an oil reservoir is installed in a compressor for the purpose of returning part of discharged oil into the oil reservoir, at the time of starting the compressor or driving the compressor in order to return the discharged oil back into the compressor. The conventional oil reservoir is formed in a housing at a location corresponding to the center of a disk-shaped driving disk of a motor and a motor shaft which are attached to a piston so as to be free to rotate. In the oil reservoir, the discharged oil which has been discharged from a cylinder of the compressor is kept for a predetermined time without being utilized, and is discharged through a discharge hole which is provided at a side of the center of the disk-shaped driving disk. In the conventional oil reservoir, however, the discharge hole is provided at the side of the disk-shaped driving disk. Therefore, the discharged oil is discharged at a high speed and the discharged oil is in a high temperature state. Therefore, due to the discharge of the oil at a high speed and at a high temperature, the oil discharged through the discharge hole is deteriorated and solidified, and is generally cooled by the air in a room in which the compressor is installed. As a result, only a small amount of oil is discharged into the compressor per unit of time and the space through which the discharged oil is discharged into the compressor is reduced. $7.7 \pm 4.6$ $9.5 \pm 5.7$ $10.6 \pm 6.3$ $7.5 \pm 4.4$ $11.0 \pm 5.3$ $10.4 \pm 5.8$
