cancer. Breast cancer cells establish complex interactions with the host environment, especially the bone microenvironment. The tumor cells have infiltrated into the bone, and released a number of substances, including large amounts of adhesion factors, prostaglandins and other signaling molecules, which may modulate osteoclast function, and enhance bone resorption. Remarkably, breast cancer cells can create an "osteolytic" phenotype, which suggests a role for bone in the metastasis of the disease. However, the mechanisms that promote bone resorption are not clear. In order to understand the molecular mechanisms of bone
