Motion capture: A viable technology FIFA 22 introduces HyperMotion Technology, which uses motion capture data collected from 22 real-life players playing a complete, high-intensity football match in motion capture suits. The data collected from player movements, tackles, aerial duels and on-ball actions is used to power FIFA 22 gameplay. “This is a new way for us to play FIFA; having the ability to be able to react to all the physical actions of the human body, we’re able to go deeper and dig a little bit more into the actual game mechanics,” says EA Sports producer Aaron McElroy. “For any player to be able to do those things, we wanted them to have to try and see how that would actually feel if it’s something they’re trying to do in-game.” It can be a little off-putting when you go into motion capture mode for the first time and your avatar makes an effortless defensive block with seemingly no resistance. But the technology of motion capture just isn’t there yet. Thankfully, there are plenty of off-the-field factors that make learning to play in the virtual game world relatively easy. “One of the things we’re finding with that is that when a team brings people in for training, you’re actually able to see [where they’re] operating at,” says McElroy. “You’re able to see their ability levels, and you’re able to show them visually, ‘This is what your footwork is looking like. You’re not kicking this right, or you’re not kicking this in this position.’ “We were already looking at [the data] and asking, ‘Do we need to find ways to represent this?’ We were going into looking for that support, and as it’s grown, we’ve needed to evolve the motion capture because we wanted to see what we could do with it. We wanted to be able to do a lot of the things that you’re doing in the game.” The technology has improved so much over the last 12 months. It’s going to be interesting to see what happens when this actually becomes the norm and how new players adapt. There’s probably going to be a lot of shying away from the motion
