The place for smart people who are becoming more and more disconnected We can all tell there is a problem, but where can we find a solution to what has become a modern conundrum? Sam Dennison is a staunch supporter of the National Health Service. It's the reason he is so passionate about making positive change. How is he going to make positive change when he feels like his relationship with the people he serves is in tatters? When Sam was diagnosed with schizophrenia, his life changed forever. It was a brand new experience – one he barely understood. Sam's experience has led him to become a passionate advocate for mental health. He started his book, "On the Verge of Madness" in 2012. He hopes to bring people together, particularly in rural communities, to address the stigma that exists in relation to mental health. He is also a trustee for Mind and the Mind Health Trust and he has worked to raise the public profile of mental illness. Sam and I had a convivial one-hour conversation. We discussed his journey, mental health in general and his current career as a Clinical Psychologist, including how he has learned to adapt to mental illness. We also discussed his thoughts on the crisis in mental health care in our country at this time. You can listen to our interview here.
