Q: Tidbits about graph database design I'm working on a data-driven graph db structure. One of the features I would like to support is "query graph nodes". I am using Neo4j as the graph db engine. Will Neo4j provide something like node property validation in Neo4j? In other words, is there any out-of-the-box way to support the following behaviour Creating nodes with property keys that won't exist in the graph (unsuitable keys) Deleting nodes with unsuitable properties I see there is a way to implement a custom neo4j query d0c515b9f4

I have the following (lifted from stackoverflow) definition: char *inet_pton(int af, const char *src, void *dst); which outputs inet_pton() - Can't convert '::' inet_pton(): Original '::' is not valid as a host address I have also tried to use ifstream (which is recommended by netinet/in.h) as follows: char *inet_ntop(int af, const void *src, char *dst, int len); which outputs inet_ntop() - Can't convert :: to string inet_ntop(): Address starts with `::' is not allowed Same with gethostbyname() as below: char *gethostbyname(const char *name); which outputs gethostbyname() - Only IPv4 addresses supported gethostbyname(): Only IPv4 addresses supported. What's wrong with these functions? Is there no possibility to parse IPv6 addresses without including "::"? A: The IPv6 address format is in the form ::ffff:ffff:ffff:ffff:ffff:ffff:ffff:ffff, a sequence of 16 hexadecimal digits, where :: is a shorthand for each of the eight groups of four hexadecimal digits. Your function char *inet_ntop(int
