The following is an overview of Photoshop's graphic and design features. Units of Measure Photoshop uses the following units of measurement: Pixels - Digital resolution. One pixel is equal to one inch in the physical world. Points - Distance between one point and the next one on the screen or in the real world. Points are 1/72 in. in real life. Photoshop points are 72 picas, or one-sixteenth of an inch. Millimeters - Length of an inch in real life. Centimeters - Length of a yard in real life. Inches - Length of a foot in real life. Standard System Units These units (in real life) are also used in Photoshop: Pix - One (1) unit of measurement in the digital world. One pixel is equal to one inch in the physical world. The width of the unit is 1 unit wide by 1 unit high (either 1 pic or 1 pixel) on a computer screen. Inches - Used for length and width. One Inch is equal to one inch in the physical world. The width of the unit is 1 unit wide by 1 unit high (either 1 pic or 1 pixel) on a computer screen. Mills - 1,000 Pixels equal one Meter (meter). Millimeters - 1,000 Points equal one Meter (meter). Inches - 1,000 Millimeters equal one Meter (meter). Revolution In Photoshop, pixels are the standard unit of measurement. There is only one way to measure: in 1s and 1p. There is no automatic change in this standard. Only the number of 1s and 1p can change. Here are the numbers for a pixel: 1 1p (inch) is equal to 1,000 points (1,000pt). In other words, 1 1p is equal to 1,000 millimeters (1,000mm). When you manually enter the pixel count (1,000), Photoshop automatically enters the px. This occurs because most of the time the pixel will be a 1x1 (1 inch by 1 inch) unit of measurement. Because a standard screen is 72 pixels wide by 72 pixels high, most people want to enter 1,000 pixels to the pixel count. 1x2 - 16 Pixels equals 1 Inch (1 in.)

The Impact of Interval Prostate Cancer Treatment. This review aims to provide a guideline to the management of newly diagnosed prostate cancer patients following a decision to treat: Options (surgery, radiation, or prostate cancer specific treatments) and treatment intervals (surgical or medical). Controversies remain over the role of watchful waiting or active surveillance for many men with low-risk prostate cancer. Treatment for low-risk prostate cancer should be guided by the patient's level of desire for treatment and hope for cure. Options include radical prostatectomy, radiation therapy, brachytherapy, cryosurgery, and prostate cancer specific therapies. All options are associated with posttreatment sexual morbidity. For newly diagnosed patients: patients with lower-risk disease who desire no additional treatment should be offered active surveillance with close observation for disease progression. If active surveillance is not desired by the patient or if there is clinical evidence of progression, treatment of the primary site or a pelvic lymph node should be considered. If the patient is low-risk and therapy is desired, and pretreatment prostate specific antigen is at or below a certain level, then appropriate treatment in the form of surgery or radiation therapy should be performed. If the patient desires radical prostatectomy, then treatment should be performed within 3 months of diagnosis; if radiation therapy is desired, treatment should be performed within 12 months of diagnosis. Evidence suggests that treatment of lymph node metastases can be delayed, provided that the patient is using alpha-blockers. Prostate cancer specific treatments for high-risk or high-volume prostate cancer should be considered. Treatment options include: watchful waiting, radiation therapy, androgen deprivation, chemotherapy, or combinations. Each of these has its own unique advantages and limitations. Long-term therapy for prostate cancer can lead to serious side effects. To keep treatment costs low, the impact of these serious side effects should be carefully considered in the decision to initiate treatment. In addition, treatment should be tailored to the patient, keeping in mind that their goals and priorities may differ from most other patients. Dysfunction of the renal vasculature in hypertension, heart failure and chronic renal failure may lead to increased production of angiotensin II, a potent vasopressor peptide. Angiotensin II acts to constrict arterioles, to increase blood pressure and to stimulate the release of renin from juxtaglomerular cells within the kidney. We have found that the second messenger calcium is involved in the control of renin release. We have
