The introduction of this new licensing model is part of the agreement between the EPL and FIFA that will begin this season, and is part of a larger, industry-wide deal with EPL clubs, which has been in the works for a number of months. Under this agreement, clubs will own the digital rights to all of their players and team logos on PlayStation Network, Xbox Live and the web. Additionally, the EPL and the clubs retain a number of key rights related to the distribution, broadcast and merchandising of the league. Please note that all licenses for our sports titles in Europe are controlled by the EPL. I was one of the key members of the process that brought the EPL to EA and I can personally state that this new licensing model is designed to help the clubs hold on to the rights to their players and logos. More detailed information regarding this new licensing model will be released at a later date. "The EPL has been at the forefront of ensuring that the players are the most valuable commodity in European football," said David Rutter, CEO of FIFA. "We are excited to be working closely with the EPL to provide a more complete soccer experience for our players, and look forward to a new relationship where the clubs can continue to make their mark in the soccer world." Both the EPL and EA would like to thank all of our fans for your continued support throughout the last 12 years, and we look forward to a long-term relationship with our audience and players in Europe. Our fans are what really make us who we are. The last year has proven that more than ever before.
