Among these features, we are proud to introduce the ball control system. We have created a fluid and responsive control system with game-design focused movements that are easier to master than ever. Setting these parameters was a key part of our multi-year development process. For starters, we decided to omit the use of moving camera cuts in our demo. Additionally, we worked closely with professional athletes to understand their movements and techniques, and to isolate the key elements they needed. Naturally, there are a few things that are still under wraps. However, for now, we're prepared to reveal the most important parts of our ball control system: The system overall The friction model You should also know that the invisible input to the system is made up of a multitude of ball-related actions. These include: Circular and explosive shot speeds based on the player's sprint Shot speed based on the player's direction The release speed of the shot Shot curve (or dive or shot type) In addition to these variables, there are five types of shots: Fast round Fast square Fast punt Short pass or direct pass Long pass There are three shots for each type: for example, fast round on the left foot, low round on the right foot, and so on. A shot is made up of one or more of these variables and then is applied, depending on player actions. When a player applies more control, the shot becomes fatter. In the end, there are four factors that determine how a player controls the ball: Circular velocity Explosive velocity Dynamic friction Body movement velocity Yes, there's a fourth factor too: acceleration. And this was a hard thing to get right. For example, to achieve correct body movement acceleration, you need to take the player's exact position into account. Unfortunately, we found this too complex for our needs. As you can imagine, a long time went into modeling the different variations of shots that could occur as a result of these four factors. Each player's shot can be very different, depending on his or her style and physical qualities. For example, a player's shot speed can be affected by their sprint. A faster sprint will increase the player's shot speed. Also, in our game a

Amelioration of experimental autoimmune encephalomyelitis by a peptide vaccine targeting MOG 17-36 is partially dependent on TGF-beta. TGF-beta is known to have a regulatory influence over T cell-mediated autoimmunity. We have previously shown that TGF-beta inhibits the generation of Th1 cells in vivo. A TGF-beta-sensitive line of T cells has also been implicated in pathogenicity of experimental autoimmune encephalomyelitis (EAE). In the present study we evaluated the effect of an immunogenic peptide that contains a predominant TGF-beta-sensitive epitope within the human myelin oligodendrocyte glycoprotein (MOG) on the development of EAE. MOG.H17-36-immunized mice were virtually protected from EAE when treated with low-dose neutralizing anti-TGF-beta Ab prior to immunization, or by blocking TGF-beta during the development of EAE. Mice primed to MOG.H17-36 were partially protected against EAE by treatment with TGF-beta antibody post-induction. When anti-IL-4 Ab was used post-induction, MOG.H17-36-immunized mice were fully protected from EAE, but if the Ab was given pre-induction, it exacerbated the disease. MOG.H17-36-induced, TGF-beta-sensitive CD4+ T cells were present in the lymph nodes and brain of protected mice. Treatment of MOG.H17-36-immunized mice with an antagonist of TGF-beta receptor kinase activity prolonged the clinical symptoms of EAE. Treatment with inhibitor of Bruton's tyrosine kinase also resulted in a delay of EAE. These results suggest that the protective effect
