“We’ve spent the past two years developing our own proprietary motion capture technology,” said Giancarlo Ibba, FIFA creative director. “Combined with the refined speed, reaction and touch of the game, it has resulted in the most fluid and immersive experience possible.” Ibba added that the team also wanted to create a game that would be more than just visually spectacular: “Fifa 22 Product Key incorporates all the gameplay innovations we introduced in FIFA 19, combined with the audiovisual improvements, to create the most intense and realistic gameplay experience yet.” FIFA 22 will be available in the Americas September 19, and worldwide September 22. Check out the trailer below: As a kid, I found my first exposure to soccer and football was with the colorful diagrams and videos you can find on the internet. As I've gotten older, and have taken the sport more and more seriously, I've come to understand that all those diagrams and videos paint an incomplete picture of what actually happens on the field in a game of soccer. There's this idea that some big balls come into play, people get pushed, and then a set of four lines comes out somewhere on the field, and people stand on the lines. This is certainly true in some limited circumstances, but it's not as simple as that. "Soccer is a very difficult sport to play by yourself," said Steven Pienkos, director of eSports at EA. "So when we were working on FIFA, we wanted to make sure we had the most authentic experience out there." The process of developing the 22nd installment in the series starts with the creation of the virtual world of FIFA Soccer. In this simulated world, each real-life player on a soccer team has an exact, digital counterpart. Those players are then put into a studio and "virtually" forced to complete real-life tasks such as dribbling a ball, passing it, kicking it, dodging obstacles and taking shots. The virtual players are also forced to respond to actual players and to react to actions made by those players, allowing the development team to better predict the outcome of any play. Unfortunately, there's a certain unreality to this process, as there's no skin worn by the virtual players to indicate that they're following the rules of the real world. When it comes time to transfer this data to the physical world, the development team gathers actual
