Fibromyalgia (FM) is a chronic and common disease with an important social and economic burden. In the past, the management of FM has been carried out solely by physicians, since there are still no effective pharmacological treatment options. About 30% of the patients with FM are refractory to the treatment. FM is not a single disease, but a heterogeneous entity caused by an interaction between multiple genetic and environmental factors. Therefore, the incidence, clinical, and pathophysiological aspects of FM depend on the heterogeneity of the disease. Recent evidence supports the interaction of genetic and environmental factors, indicating that genetic factors have a role in the aetiology, pathophysiology, and clinical features of FM. Several genetic studies have focused on the genes of serotonin transporters, neurotrophic factors, and oxidative stress. Therefore, it is possible to identify genetic alterations that can help to explain the different clinical
