The organ-specific antisera prepared against [3H]-octanol induced rotational behavior in mice. The organ-specific antisera to lipids or lipid components are of great value in studying their role in brain functions. In the present work, organ-specific antisera were prepared against various lipid fractions including free fatty acids, phospholipids, gangliosides, and neutral lipids. As a model to investigate the antisera specificity, mice were injected with [3H]-octanol (2.5 microCi) intraperitoneally. After 14 days, the antisera were prepared by immunization with their corresponding antigens. Seven days after the first immunization, the mice were challenged with 25 microCi [3H]-octanol by intraperitoneal injection. [3H]-Octanol was cleared from blood by 90% in about 20 min. Compared with normal mice, the challenged mice showed an increase in the rotational activity and tritium accumulation in several organs. The most prominent increase occurred in the brain. The brain was dissected into various regions, and [3H]-octanol was measured by liquid scintillation counter. Increased [3H]-octanol in brain tissue was observed in several regions including the cerebrum, cerebellum, midbrain. This organ-specific antiserum will be of great value in determining the role of lipid components or lipids in various brain functions.
