Pain is a complex adaptive behavior as it deals with a wide range of sensory, emotional, cognitive, and behavioral dimensions. Pain models are used to study the behavioral consequences of pain. Here, in a view that sickness behavior, i.e. general response to infection, is an adaptive coping strategy to deal with pain, we studied the behavioral patterns in a model of persistent pain (mice subjected to a formalin-induced inflammation), where similar patterns are observed as in humans with inflammatory pain. We evaluated sickness behavior with a wide range of behavioral and physiological tests, both in short-term (intermittent acute pain) and long-term (chronic pain) models of inflammatory pain. In both models, sickness behavior consists of different behavioral responses. The behavioral tests that reflect sickness behavior (locomotor activity, food and water intake, hedonic feeding behavior, and exploratory activity) provide a complex pattern of behavior, which clearly differs from one testing session to another. In short-term models, we found transient changes in feeding behavior that depended on the duration of inflammation. In long-term models, we observed behavioral changes that were present in all the days tested, without obvious inter-day variations. These included attenuation of both spontaneous and evoked pain, as well as changes in body weight, pain threshold and responses to drug administration. Altogether, these behavioral responses were consistent with the definition of sickness behavior, and support the use of mouse models of inflammatory pain for studying the behavioral responses to persistent pain, and for pharmacological and genetic studies.[Analysis of the characters of HSV-1 associated with nonherpetic linear erythema lesions].
