On the other hand, semiconductor nonvolatile memories such as flash memory and EEPROM can store gigabytes of information. Further, nonvolatile memories have several features that are not present in conventional on-chip memories including high speed, high density, low power and a low cost. Accordingly, nonvolatile memories are now considered as the memory of choice in a variety of applications such as on-board flash memory cards, field programmable gate arrays (FPGAs), microprocessors and portable electronics. A conventional nonvolatile memory cell, such as a flash memory cell, typically includes a metal oxide semiconductor (MOS) transistor structure having a double polysilicon stack for the control gate and the floating gate. The double polysilicon stack can be separated by a thermal oxide and surrounded by an interpoly oxide, that are deposited on a substrate. Further, an interpoly oxide can be formed between the MOS transistor structure and the substrate. The MOS transistor structure includes a first polysilicon layer having a relatively large dimension and a second polysilicon layer having a relatively small dimension. The large dimension of the first polysilicon layer is adjacent to the floating gate. The large dimension of the second polysilicon layer is adjacent to the control gate. The gate oxide, the interpoly oxide and the interpoly oxide may function as insulators.
