Social Sharing Hearing back from Bell's legal team about how 'serious' the breach was Selcuk Oztunc Usta, a professor at Ryerson University in Toronto, was one of hundreds of thousands of people whose personal information was breached by Bell Mobility's servers. (Manuel Carrasquillo/CBC) Bell Canada has refused to pay for the storage of encrypted data belonging to hundreds of thousands of people whose personal information was breached. That information — including names, addresses, phone numbers, email addresses and financial data — includes details about the users' family members as well as personal information on people between the ages of 18 and 65. Bell has faced increasing criticism over the breach, including calls for the company to return the money to affected customers. Earlier this month, nearly 30 organizations and companies signed a letter calling for Bell to make good on its promise of free lifetime storage of personal information it had collected on customers. A few weeks later, Bell's lawyers went before a Montreal court — taking the unusual step of appearing in person — to ask a judge to reject a class-action lawsuit brought by dozens of affected Canadians, and to cancel any class actions or demands for monetary compensation. The request to set aside the lawsuit on grounds of jurisdictional issues was quickly granted by the Superior Court judge, essentially killing the class-action lawsuit. "It was a really bizarre and creepy situation," said Toronto lawyer Ralph Lean, who represents the class of affected Canadians in his firm's class actions practice. Bell's lawyer, John MacKinnon, told the court that while he had intended to walk into court with a neutral position, he ended up siding with his clients. "The issue is so fundamental that we wanted to ensure that the court got the complete picture as to why these people should not get their day in court," he said. (Submitted by Lean Law) Hearings to determine a compensation amount are expected in the near future. The company said earlier this month that customers affected by the breach might see a credit on their bill. What's New In?

In a popular culture of digitally corrupting the mundane, vampiric photographers is one of the most insidious. They use digitally manipulated photos as a means to manipulate others into believing they're far more desirable. Through the actions of using a camera to take photos and the capacity to connect with a wide audience, digital manipulations take on a more sinister form, and can redefine a person's image to a potentially damaging extent. But just because something is done digitally, the effects of the photograph still remains the same. UofL Digital Media Major and photographer, Ryan Teague, is putting a stamp on this idea and creating his own brand of deceptive photographs to uncover whether or not people are able to tell the difference. Through his project "Mortal Mistakes," Ryan will be taking a series of everyday photos with Photoshop's amazing "Warp Stitch" tool, and he will send them out on Instagram to unsuspecting followers and ask them to pick their favorite. "I want to find out if people can distinguish between the manipulated photo and the original photo," Ryan says. "And, even if they can, I want to know how they respond when they see the manipulated photo and the unedited photo." Ryan's intentions for this project are two-fold: on one hand, he hopes to expose not only the various methods used by photoshoppers, but also the potential impact of such media. However, if people are surprised by the use of such tools, it can further their impression of a photographer's vanity. "If you have a camera on a smart phone, you are a photographer now," says Ryan. "You can go out and take everyday pictures." This is certainly true, but it doesn't mean that a photographer of Ryan's caliber couldn't even go on to become more than just a common citizen who takes cute photos. "What I think it's going to reveal is the power behind photographs and the impact they can have on our life, and the social online world." While this is certainly an exciting project, we should take note that Ryan will be able to select the photos that end up in the best light for him. However, the three of us who are in Ryan's class would like to look for opportunities to help choose photos that most accurately portray the frustration and disappointment that his photos
