The mechanisms of sorption and dissociation of extracellular polymeric substances (EPSs) from an activated sludge were determined using a long-term batch and a short-term column experiments. The data show that EPSs sorption to the sludge matrix for both a long-term and short-term batch experiments was mainly sorption controlled, while the existence of the interaction between EPSs and sludge matrix had a secondary influence. Comparing the kinetic curves of sludge EPSs and pure EPSs, the steeper the curve of pure EPSs, the lower the affinity of the EPS to the sludge matrix. Further analysis of these kinetic data show that the sorption of EPSs from activated sludge was cooperative and followed a power law sorption model. The dissociation of EPSs from the sludge matrix was a single-site pseudo-first-order model with a considerable rate constant of 27 h(-1).Systemic factors associated with human leukocyte antigen-DRB1*09: Do they increase risk for narcolepsy with or without cataplexy?
