For those unfamiliar with the show, "The Magician's Apprentice" has the Magician searching for someone to apprentice under for the rest of his life. So far, the Magician has met several people who his life changed for the better after the four seasons, and he is now close to losing his decision to choose a final apprentice and allow them to destroy their school instead of sending them away to peace. The Magician just wants to have a peaceful life, but his overbearing assistants want to force other people to live their lives as they see fit. Who do you want to apprentice under? Cell-based cytotoxicity assays. Cell-based assays are now used to rank the cytotoxicity of new compounds under development, as the major products for many biological applications have been found to be toxic (1, 2). Here, we discuss several methods to measure cytotoxicity of compounds in cultured cells and how to address biological questions that arise from these experiments. We start with a brief introduction to the types of toxicity that can be investigated using cell-based assays: membrane and microstructural toxicity, apoptosis, necrosis, and cytolysis. Each of these has its own toxicity signature and we present methods to identify these. This is followed by a description of the assays that are available to measure the toxicity of compounds. These include: ATP content assays, spectroscopic assays, lactate dehydrogenase release assays, and
