History Photoshop was first developed by Walt Masurovski, John Knoll and Jerry Pournelle in 1987. It was originally called The First Photoshop. The program was named so that it would be spelled in the same way as Final Cut Pro (see below). The version 1.0 was released on October 18, 1990, and sold for $695. Since then, a series of major revisions have been released. Version 1.0 was a bitmap editor that showed a tiny preview of the image it was modifying. Version 2.0 was a 32-bit floating point editor, which caused it to crash on the "Aero Silver" Microsoft Windows version of the operating system. This version also introduced the "history" feature. The next version was a 32-bit floating point editor that could save "photorealistic" output (called RIFF) as well as non-photorealistic (NIFF) output. It could also open RAW files. Version 4.0 came out in 1992 and introduced masking. The next version, 4.5, was based on Adobe's C++ language and introduced Brush tools and the Layers panel. The next major version, 5.0, came in 1994 and allowed for navigation in image files, as well as the new Smart Filters feature. The next major revision, 5.5, was the first real major update of Photoshop since the year 1993 and released in 1997. The versions 7.0, 7.5 and 8.0 represented major design and usability changes, including a multi-platform OS support and support for running on both Windows and OS X systems. It also enabled file and printer sharing via a Remote Application feature, and introduced the Histogram and new blending modes. Photoshop CS is the latest version, available as an upgrade to the previous version. It was released in June 2006 and offers professional and advanced features. Many have criticized the program and the cost of the upgrade. Approach The basic way to manipulate images is to apply a filter on the visible part of the image and then create a layer that covers the visible part and makes it visible. Then the user can either mask that layer, or paint a new shape or selection that lies over the visible part. Once the user selects a layer in the Layers panel, the user can use tools such as the Marquee tool to select the visible part of the image, which lets them then add a new layer and paint

Bad blood between city police and the city's anarchists has spilled into the courtroom and onto the streets this past week. A new front in the war between anarchists and the police has surfaced - and this time it is an armed robbery that ignited the clash. On Thursday night, anarchist-identified group members allegedly fired a single shot at a man who had just stolen the contents of a police foot locker. Police officers noticed the man and followed him into a nearby West Seattle park, where they cornered him and arrested him. That same night, anarchists in West Seattle began protesting the arrest, and, police said, some of the protesters hurled paint, flour, rocks and fireworks at officers. A few days later, three suspects were arrested and charged with throwing objects at police and damaging property. Police Chief John Diaz said the West Seattle People's Law Center has filed a complaint about the disorderly conduct of one of the suspects, who was involved in an altercation with a protester during the protest. The complaining party told police that the suspect had thrown a rock at her. Defense attorney Chuck Weber said that his client, who was not named because of the nature of his case, was defending himself from rocks thrown by protesters. Weber said his client was singled out during the protest because police identified him as a protester and his arm was injured. He said his client was treated at Harborview Medical Center. Weber said his client has filed a motion to suppress evidence, challenging his arrest and detention. "I think I'm justified in defending my client's freedom," Weber said. Weber said that his client was not a participant in the violent protest or in the robbery of the police footlocker, and that his client has never been charged with any crime. Weber said that his client was at the park because he works there and has friends there. Weber said that his client, who was wearing a black jacket, a black T-shirt, a black hat and black boots, was sitting in his car when the officers approached him. The attorney said that his client had been smoking marijuana that night but that he does not use that and had not been drinking. The Seattle Times will not name the suspects because of the nature of their case.
