This invention relates to a package intended to contain cosmetics and similar products, and, more particularly, to a multi-compartment cosmetic package, preferably a lipstick package having multiple compartments in which a plurality of lipsticks are packaged. Lipstick generally consists of a fluid waxy or creamy mass of a pigment, a fluid carrier, and a cosmetic or flavor ingredient. The cosmetic ingredient may be one or more hydrophobic fluids, together with an emulsifying agent and/or a wax. The fluid carrier may consist of oil and, optionally, a small quantity of a hydrocarbon solvent, such as petroleum or mineral oil, which may then contain emulsifying agents, film formers and/or waxes. The pigment may be in a natural or synthetic waxes such as beeswax, and in a natural or synthetic hydrocarbon such as toluene or paraffin, which serves to enhance the physical properties of the product. To apply lipstick, an amount of the lipstick is selected, usually by pouring an amount of the lipstick into a spatula or similar implement. A minor portion of the lipstick is then applied to the lips of the user. However, several drawbacks result from the conventional use of the customary, single-compartment lipstick tubes. One problem is that a portion of the lipstick remains in the tube even when only a small amount of lipstick is intended to be applied to the lips, so that the bottom of the tube is often coated with a quantity of lipstick. The undesirable result is that the lipstick may travel into other articles which may be subsequently coated with lipstick. Also, the lipstick at the bottom of the tube may tend to dry out over a period of time, so that the cosmetic ingredient loses its effectiveness. Another problem is that the conventional lipstick tubes are usually single-compartment containers having a single orifice which may be opened by severing a portion of the tube with a blade or other sharp instrument. This opening is usually large enough to permit most or even all of the lipstick to be applied to the lips. However, if a small amount of lipstick is to be applied, it is difficult to squeeze the lipstick out of the tube through the small opening. As a result, the lipstick is sometimes spilled, which is undesirable and messy. A further problem is that it is difficult to place a second lipstick into the lipstick tube, so that one tube will contain only one lipstick, such as a pair of lips. Yet another problem is that the lipstick, when dropped on the floor

Gut and immune responses to Metarhizium robertsii infection in the red flour beetle, Tribolium castaneum. The red flour beetle (RFB) Tribolium castaneum is a widespread and often important pest of stored grain, but also a model for insect immunity. We examined how the gut and hemolymph-associated immune system respond to Metarhizium robertsii infection in RFB. Feeding on infected tissues reduced survival compared to uninfected controls. Injection of M. robertsii conidia into the abdomen resulted in immune challenge, and survival was negatively correlated with the dose. Injection of yeast-derived lipopolysaccharide (LPS) induced a systemic immune response as indicated by a rapid up-regulation of five putative immune genes including diptericin and defensin, four genes in the AMP gene family. Fat body LPS injection induced a transient up-regulation of a component of the Toll pathway. Infection of the FB with M. robertsii conidia resulted in a more transient response. The fat body gene expressions for glucose and glycogen metabolism inversely related to survival, and glycogen increased with enhanced M. robertsii infection. However, increased glycogen did not occur at earlier times. Glucose metabolism may be associated with the FB's ability to move from the AMP gene expression to the Toll pathway. Our data suggest that the immune response of FB during M. robertsii infection is associated with fitness.// // SFUIUtilities.h // SocialFix // // Created by Jim O'Neil on 7/9/13. // Copyright (c) 2013 Stackpath.
