Related Articles Dish Network's blindsiding move of dropping OTA TV programming as part of a price increase is raising hackles in the broadcasting industry. Consumers in the Miami-Dade, Fla., market, for example, are already upset about a variety of other things happening to their basic cable service. Even if the company could lose the war of persuasion to the direct broadcast satellite providers, which have already gobbled up the market share for the off-the-air broadcasts, it will be loathe to be identified with the OTA business as consumers stop viewing TV programming over the air. American consumers have been slow to get more sophisticated in their use of television programming, and OTA broadcasting has been the main source. That is changing quickly, however, and consumers are abandoning traditional OTA receivers in favor of cable, satellite, and Internet delivery. According to the Digital TV Group (DTVG), "consumers have been leaving traditional OTA TV subscriptions at an accelerating rate since last fall, as the migration to digital video and HDTV content gains momentum." The DTVG estimates that OTA subscriptions will decline from 3.4 million in 2007 to 2.7 million in 2010. DTVG president Michael Mace expects the rate of losses to accelerate to 2.5 million subscribers by 2012. DTVG chief executive Raymond C. Waddell says the figure does not include the millions of cord cutters not paying for traditional TV service. The decline is due to technological change, particularly the migration to full-featured HDTVs and broadband, and the rising popularity of streaming video from the Internet. Those changes have sharply reduced the value of OTA broadcasts. There is an increasing market for advertising on the streaming Internet video. According to the AP, "Streaming video is an increasingly popular mode for watching television programming online, so much so that advertisers are rushing to attract the online eyeballs of viewers, and cable and satellite operators are getting offers to sell streaming ads." In the U.S., cable providers view advertising as a means to subsidize channel costs, and they oppose displaying advertising on streaming video, which competes for bandwidth with the traditional video. But while viewers may be buying from commercial-free online sources, they are also accustomed to advertising on traditional TV, and advertising in online video seems even more intrusive than TV advertisements. To cope with the loss of OTA subscribers, the country's six largest TV networks have been negotiating for nearly three

The results, taken from Google's search engine, reveal that more adults than ever are searching for information on the subject. The searches for the phrase 'student sex' were made in 2005 and more than 450,000 of the 533,000 hits came from the US. This has led some to speculate that campus life has become "more available and therefore more accessible" to students. On the other hand, the reported use of the internet to download copyrighted material has increased dramatically. The report says that in 2007, 58% of people aged between 18 and 24 said they had used the internet to download copyrighted material. Since 2000, the percentage of teenage internet users who said that they had either downloaded MP3s, copied MP3s or ripped CD, DVD or VHS with a recorded copy has increased. The number of users aged between 18 and 24 who agreed
