* Adobe Photoshop Lightroom: The newest addition to the Adobe Photoshop family (version 10), Lightroom is a terrific asset to the Photoshop ecosystem. It's a powerful image management tool that imports and analyzes images from an assortment of sources, including catalogs, online sites, and the like. It can be a useful image-editing tool as well. * Snapseed: This is another wonderful image-editing tool. It's easier to use than the other Adobe Photoshop options, and it offers a ton of power to the user. It's available for download from the Google Play store (Android), the Apple App Store (iPhone/iPod Touch), and the Windows Store (Windows 8). # IS THERE FREE, NON-ADOBE SOFTWARE? Several free, non-Adobe image editors exist. Fireworks is a popular choice. It's cross-platform and offers some wonderful features (see Figure 6-6) that rivals Photoshop. Figure 6-6: Fireworks (left) and Photoshop (right). Photoshop is a solid choice for the creative crowd. It has various options for those who are more interested in design than image editing. It makes a great tool for designing for websites and other print projects. * Topaz Labs: Its companion, After Effects, is a fantastic professional tool for building websites, animations, and other multimedia projects. * GIMP: The GNU Image Manipulation Program is a free and open source image-editing application that's available in many languages. * GimpShop: This offers an extensive feature set, including photomontage, enhanced and non-destructive editing, and color grading. _Windows Ink_, as in the new generation of the Tablet PC, is another tool for creating and editing images. It comes with an assortment of pens and a digital stylus. The best part of _Windows Ink_ is that it's fully integrated with Windows and the newest Windows 8 apps. * Paint.net: This is a free, open source photo editing application. It uses the GIMP tools to produce its images. * Camtasia: This is a screen recording tool from TechSmith that enables you to record your computer screen at high-resolution video.

I looked at the figures but found no reference to Maori, which the group in question did. The reference points do seem weak, as pointed out. The same issue arises when looking at EDM vs MMS, but I don't think it's conclusive. FSS seem to have had less effect. Superficially, two surveys are broadly similar, but the differences are large (and inattentional) enough to make the presence of Maori effects, if they existed, unlikely to have been detected in either. Now, I suppose you can say that if there were any effect, it would only appear in one of the sets of figures for any one survey and never for any other survey, but that's hard to test for. The reality is that no one has done research to see if actual Maori exist, so the only way you can know whether their inclusion or exclusion would have made a difference is to run a big, expensive MPS-type study and see if it changes the results. Which hasn't happened. As for the difference between Maori and 'other' children - the arguments against Maori-only or MMS-only are not going to be remotely close to conclusive. Certainly the MMS setting isn't one that would have included Maori, and any comparisons between Maori and 'others' in the no-MMS setting (HOBY 1978) are a long way from conclusive. I'd much rather see a study that took up as many of the surveys as possible, leaving the 'Maori vs others' debate to one side (which the NZ Children's Study set out to do). Any survey with a reasonably significant number of Maori would be fine, as would other types of survey if they're large enough. Maori are counted separately in most surveys, so we'd just need to add them as a section and collect data on where they are. The obvious direction is a between-group study, but if any large survey has included all the populations of interest, we can also do a within-group study to test differences between groups. At this point, all we need is for the appropriate survey to re-do the relevant subset of surveys. I'd happily bet that the 'other' group would be a huge enough subset that you could get big sample sizes for the 'Maori vs others' comparisons, for instance. I'll be very surprised if this never happens, but a definitive study

Plant secondary metabolites are involved in a wide range of physiological responses, but they can also be beneficial for human health. In addition to their economic impact, plant-derived beverages, such as tea and wine, are rich sources of bioactive agents that can be used for the prevention or treatment of numerous human diseases, such as obesity, diabetes, cardiovascular disease, cancer, and Alzheimer's disease. An area of research that is gaining interest is that of natural antioxidants and their use in formulations. A team of researchers from the University of Hertfordshire, in collaboration with Wageningen UR has been conducting research into the extraction of three potent antioxidant molecules that are found in the leaves of the coffee tree. At the centre of their research is a human cell line that has been manipulated to produce elevated levels of β-amyloid. They have now developed a novel process to extract the active molecules and have published their findings in Drug Delivery System, a journal of the Royal Society of Chemistry. The team has been examining the potential of a group of plants known as proanthocyanidins (from the Greek word proan- meaning 'before birth', and kyan- meaning 'black') to reduce the formation of amyloid plaques. The compounds consist of multiple subunits that are linked via a chain of carbon atoms. The team investigated proanthocyanidins from two different species of the coffee tree, C. arabica and C. canephora, and combined the results of their studies to establish a ratio to be used in future research. The team demonstrated the effectiveness of their process in extracting the active compounds in amyloid plaque-producing cells, with results in line with those they obtained for the plant extracts. They have now turned their attention to using their method in the development of nutraceutical products that can be used to prevent and treat age-related neurodegenerative diseases.If you are a Caltech professor who has never given a public lecture on campus, you can start now.
