single entity? I have an Entity called Recipe. One recipe can have Ingredients which in turn has attributes like Width, Height, Colour etc. How would you structure your data? Should I have Ingredients as another Entity or should I just leave it as a collection of Strings in a Recipe? A: If the Ingredients don't have a natural primary key, it is generally not a good idea to have them as separate entities as this will result in a lot of redundancies in your database. If the ingredients are unique, then it makes sense to have it as a separate entity, but be aware that this will increase the number of joins you'll have to do. However, it sounds like The true voice of South Africa –- a nation under siege in her own land.

Clinton South African journalists' lives matter. This is a fact we need to remember in the lead up to South Africa's General Election on April 22. South African media are under siege in their own land. And they are doing everything they can to continue to fight back. How many more journalists do we need to lose before we see that it is time to stop pampering media bosses who have no regard for freedom of the press? It is time to say, 'Enough is enough'. It is time to remember that media owners are accountable to no one. Everything we say and do are watched and noted. If we are not careful, and brave enough, we could end up having our lives ruined. We are already living like this, and more journalists are dying. Reporters are not afforded any special privileges. If it is our job to ask questions, we take the risk of losing our jobs and our lives. South African journalists have been down this road before and more journalists lost their lives. Newspaper editor Nico de Jager was murdered in 1982 by the apartheid regime. In 1987, a special forces officer forced his way into a newsroom and shot dead: Marci Shapiro, in protest of black journalists being fired from a paper. South African Broadcasting Corporation (SABC) Director of Public Affairs Stuart Reid was killed in 1983 by a gunshot to the head by an unknown person when he was walking back to his car in the early hours of the morning. Most recently, ex-editors at the South African Broadcasting Corporation (SABC) were killed in 1997 by unidentified gunmen. Our recent history has been replete with cases where black and white journalists have been killed for their work. The question that needs answering is, why are we still allowing it to happen? It has become clear that the Constitution of South Africa is being violated. When the press is weakened, in addition to the weakening of the administration of justice, the country becomes open to corruption and political fraud. South African journalists have been threatened and even physically attacked. In 2000, thirteen South African journalists, all black, were assaulted and beaten by men in white T-
