Creating an Image File If you plan on doing any image manipulation, you need to create an image file. It is your image file that holds the data that was created with Photoshop.

It is also your reference against which you can compare and evaluate your editing changes. Here's how to create an image file for your photograph: 1. Choose File⇒Open and locate your original image, as shown in Figure 10-2. If your image has an alpha channel, it is still available for use in your image file. 2. If necessary, resize your image to the desired final size and resolution. For more on this, see Chapter 7. Don't change the resolution in the traditional way. Rather, change the Size option to 1:1 from File⇒Size.

This resizes the image to a specific size. If you set the resolution to 1:1, Photoshop will usually preserve your original resolution. 3. Close the image window (Windows button+W) and choose File⇒Save. When the file opens, you see a few options: * _Save for Web &

Devices: _ Saves the image to an optimized JPEG file that optimizes your file for web and mobile devices. Your original file is not overwritten. * _ Save As: _ Saves your image to a different filename. There is also an Overwrite box, which can be checked to replace the image if it already exists. * _Save:_ Saves the image to a temporary location on your computer. 4.

Click Save.

Photoshop saves the image as a JPEG file.

The location that you choose should be a safe, easy-to-access folder that you can use to access the file later. 5.

Locate and drag the file to another location or storage device. For example, on a flash drive, you may want to store your files in a different folder than the one that you use for your daily work, because flash drives often don't survive overnight. Adobe's Creative Cloud offers a complete program with many updates for professional photographers, including Photoshop. If you create your own images at home, you can download an affordable and useful trial version, and then

The article explores the question, why did the

Conservatives perform

so differently in the provincial race in the 2011 general election

compared to the federal election in 2006? The author writes that there were three major differences between the provincial and federal contests. The first is that the Conservatives had a better party brand in the former, which also helped the party in the former. The second is the composition of the electorate, with voters less likely to support the Conservatives at the provincial level. And the third is that the Conservatives were well-established as the federal party in the province, while the Liberals were seen as newcomers. The author argues that although these reasons are not the full story, they explain some of the differences between the two elections, and they are more plausible explanations than “caused by anything to do with the previous Conservative government’s record on health care, taxation or employment.” Thanks for this. Vancouver: In the last federal election, Stephen Harper's Conservatives swept to power in Canada. But in the last two Ontario elections, not only did Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff not win the federal Conservative stronghold, the Bloc Québécois came within a whisker of winning the provincial election. What went wrong? In a word, it's a small "d." As Prof. John English notes in "Harper's Blue Ribbon Campaign," it's small government, small business, small province and small dashes of small business, small

Liberal and small NDP.

former Alberta Conservative leader Jim last month. He was

grounds of "principal
