// Updated 2017. A radio frequency identification (RFID) system utilizes one or more RFID tags (or “active tags”) that communicate information over an RF communications channel in response to an interrogation signal. The RFID tag may be attached to an object or article, and an RFID reader (e.g., an RFID interrogator or scanner, a reader, or tag reader) may be used to send a signal to interrogate the tag. In general, the tag responds to the signal by outputting a serial bit stream, encoded with information stored internally within the tag. Typically, the tag includes a silicon chip (or “microchip”), which contains the RFID circuitry, and a passive (i.e., non-powered) antenna embedded within a plastic or metal tag case (e.g., a molded housing). An RFID tag is typically coupled to its associated object (or article) using adhesion or attachment to the object, such as, for example, an adhesive, a fastener, or a coupling, using an external adhesive, clip, or hinge. A tag may include a non-volatile (e.g., EEPROM) memory storage device, or it may be programmed with dynamic memory storage cells. For example, the tag may use one or more commercially available Static Random Access Memory (SRAM) integrated circuit chips, or it may include an Application Specific Integrated Circuit (ASIC) chip that contains an embedded memory device, such as, for example, a Flash device. Typically, an RFID tag may be programmed after its manufacture, such as, for example, using a hand-held programming device, a laptop computer, a desktop computer, or a reader connected to a network, to provide different levels of functionalities in the tag. For example, a tag may be programmed to operate as a transponder, to operate as a transponder that generates encoded response signals, or to operate as a tag with a memory or non-volatile storage device. In most RFID readers, the interrogating RF signal is in a nominal (or “industry standard”) frequency range of, for example, 125-134 MHz. The carrier frequency is usually converted to a higher frequency to reduce the load on the tag's power supply. There are two types of tag response protocols: continuous, in which the tag is powered and the interrogating RF signal continuously energizes the tag to maintain a logical state;
