Even if you are a Photoshop pro, you can use Photoshop Elements at your job, home or wherever you want. This post contains a link to a personal experience which can be helpful when learning to use Photoshop Elements. It may be helpful for beginners. Before you can begin to edit images, you must first make sure you are up to speed with Elements itself, especially the File menu and the Edit menu. Editor Basics Before you start learning how to edit photos and images in Photoshop, you need to understand the following basic features: Undo (Ctrl + Z) to go back to the last step you made. (Ctrl + Z) to go back to the last step you made. Cut (Ctrl + X) to cut what you are working on. (Ctrl + X) to cut what you are working on. Copy (Ctrl + C) to copy what you are working on. (Ctrl + C) to copy what you are working on. Paste (Ctrl + V) to paste a cut and copied item to where you are working. (Ctrl + V) to paste a cut and copied item to where you are working. Reset (Ctrl + F5) to make sure all your dialogs are at their default settings. Undo (Ctrl + Z) Every time you change anything on your computer, you may need to undo your changes. You can undo all of your changes or undo the last few changes made to the file. There are other types of edits you may want to undo for different reasons, which is why we listed four choices when asking you to choose how to undo. Undoing edits doesn't take anything away from your work, but it does leave a trace in the digital world that it has been changed. Photoshop Elements gives you the option to undo several types of edits. You can use the undo feature in Photoshop Elements by pressing Ctrl + Z to go back to the last edit you made or the last few edits you made. The following are some of the most common undo options: Edit — Selects the last few edits you made to the file. Selects the last few edits you made to the file. All — Undoes all changes you have made. Undoes all changes you have made. More recent — Undoes changes made to your last opened image. In the next section, we 05a79cecff

Q: Is there a way to combine our site and central design? There are a few themes out there where the site design and the desktop theme/layout look identical, with the same color scheme, fonts, etc. What I was thinking about (without the need to create new designs for every site) is creating a custom, centralized theme for the Stack Exchange network. The benefits of that are: No changes to the site-specific sites. The only site-specific design change would be to the Stack Overflow theme. No updating to every site's theme. Any changes to the theme would just need to be rolled out to the site. It's a centralized, unified theme. No design conflicts. Users of any site can get one-stop shopping access to the core design elements Any design updates/changes made to the central theme would affect all sites. If this is considered a good idea or a bad idea, I'd appreciate it if you were to comment about it. I can address any concerns you may have. I just thought I'd ask before I did the legwork. :) A: I'm not sure if this is a good idea, but it's certainly on the table. The trouble I see with it is in the question of what changes should be made to it. What we do to each site on the network is customized to it. This means that our sites have styling specific to their theme or branding (though you could argue that our branding is specifically more a part of our image than our look). You know what your site looks like and it's changed as we thought it should be. The problem is that a generic shared network theme would either look horrible or be a huge code rewrite. It would likely look horrible because (from my experience) users of this network theme would all have very different site-specific styling and preferences. This isn't a huge problem for SO because the site is such a far-out outlier in the network and most users of that network theme wouldn't even notice it. However, if we were to make this the network's default theme the problems I mentioned would become much more apparent and more prominent. There's also the problem of making sure that whatever is done is done in a way that is good for all the sites (as they are equal to each other, that means all the sites would be entitled to the benefit of any quality changes or fixes).
