
to know about them. Is it OK to make them all public? Or must I mark them as "protected" and only allow an object of the same type to access them. A: This is a great example of why you should think more about your design. It's not really difficult to think up a design where you want to keep the internal details private from the outside world. Typically there are a few approaches to this. One is that you give your class a "public interface" and then make protected methods in the implementation (as you do now). This means that an implementation class can provide its own internal implementation that can be used by calling code but can't be used by anyone (outside of your class) except the methods in the public interface. In this pattern, your internal methods aren't really protected and so anyone who has access to your class can see them. Another approach is that you make the class non-public and then package up a class that implements the public interface. In this pattern, you have the extra consideration of your public interface and protected methods being distributed in a single file. But the less you want to publish your implementation to 3rd parties, the less of a temptation you have to make your methods protected. If you want, you can make all methods public and
