It uses a level of data that is unprecedented and will revolutionize the way players interact on the pitch,” said Peter Rössler, FIFA Executive Producer. “It’s what FIFA is all about, with players on the move and dynamic movement throughout the game. We’re really excited to introduce this powerful innovation.” Features of the HyperMotion Technology in FIFA 22 include: A smarter ball, and players, Access to information with new in-game AI, Real-world player likeness, New camera views and player animations, Overlay-based in-game mechanics, and New goal celebrations and mechanics. The FIFA Team, together with the game’s developers, are putting together numerous gameplay features, including access to the new Pro Player ID™ feature, a new in-depth daily training tutorial which will give fans the chance to hone their skills. In addition to this, Rössler’s promising “daily analysis workshop,” which will involve weekly premium tips and predictions, will provide fans with information and advice on how to improve the attributes of their players. “FIFA is a multi-faceted sport and we’re committed to ensuring that each element of the game – from the rules, to the football culture, to the formation of clubs and conferences – reflects a level of authenticity that matches the sportsmanship, passion and athleticism of the real thing,” said Albert Rösti, Managing Director of EA SPORTS FIFA. “We are deeply passionate about this industry and nothing is more important to us than our fans. We’re not only bringing a handful of new mechanics to life, but we’re taking our deepest expertise in player intelligence, in-game technology and gaming mechanics to give our fans the next generation of FIFA.” FIFA 20 will be available from PlayStation 4, Xbox One, Nintendo Switch, PC, and STEAM on September 27.
