The site-specific primary metabolism of the Gluconobacter oxydans mlo mutant: the central metabolism is still active to produce a small amount of lactate. A phenotype-based approach was used to distinguish the effects on primary metabolism of the loss of membrane-bound lactate dehydrogenase and of the inability to synthesize riboflavin in Gluconobacter oxydans. A mlo mutant, unable to synthesize riboflavin, showed the same growth as its parent strain, suggesting that the inability to synthesize riboflavin does not significantly affect growth and primary metabolism. In contrast, the membranes of the mlo mutant are compromised, as evidenced by the inability to grow on minimal medium containing glycolate as carbon and energy source. The most striking effect of the mlo mutation is the inability to synthesize lactate from pyruvate. An orthogonal pattern of gene expression was observed in the mlo mutant, when compared to the wild type, both in early exponential and stationary phase. This was confirmed by cDNA microarray and proteomic analysis, showing changes in the expression of 13% of the total genes and 6% of the proteins. These changes include the down-regulation of gene expression of pyruvate carboxylase and the up-regulation of several genes involved in pyruvate metabolism. Taken together, these data suggest that central metabolism is still active in G. oxydans, even though it is unable to produce lactate. This invention relates to a coupling which permits a pivoting movement of one member relative to another. In particular, this invention relates to a coupling for permitting a pivoting movement between a chamber such as a kitchen cabinet and a kitchen faucet. In a kitchen it is desirable to be able to adjust a faucet to direct water toward a particular area of the kitchen and away from other areas. In a conventional faucet a handle is positioned behind a pivotable faucet. When the handle is turned the faucet is moved to the desired position. It is desirable to have an adjustable coupling which permits a pivoting movement between a chamber and a faucet.
