A possible silver compound treatment for acne vulgaris. The occurrence of silver (Ag) in the stratum corneum of human skin was studied.

The concentrations of Ag in the stratum corneum and epidermis were 0.16 and 0.20 microgram/g, respectively. The direct transfer of Ag from an agar gel with various Ag concentrations was tested. The permeation into the receptor fluid from the agar gel containing 1 or 3 micrograms/ml Ag was 5.3 and 7.6 micrograms/ml, respectively. Further, the therapeutic effect of a possible Ag compound (Biomol, Ltd. Japan) was tested for acne vulgaris. The test was performed by injecting the compound on the skin surface of human volunteers once a day for 4 days. The clinical effect was noticed in 6 of 12 volunteers. The clinical efficacy and the analytical data were concordant. The mechanism of therapeutic effect is unclear. Silver is thought to accumulate in the stratum corneum, where it forms a compound by reaction with lipids, a phenomenon that may be necessary to render it effective against acne vulgaris.
