“We are building on the foundations of the most popular football video game franchise in the world and adding further elements and improvements that are unique to FIFA,” said Oliver Bierhoff, senior producer, FIFA. “We are confident FIFA 22 will provide a complete, compelling football experience at launch.” Bringing the Total Experience to Life The core of the Total Experience in FIFA 22 comes from the motion capture data and those of nine elite players from the Pro Evolution Soccer Academy. A multitude of layers and layers of gameplay are developed using this data, evolving the way the game is played, offering new gameplay possibilities and unravelling the unpredictable nature of football. FIFA's team of creators has worked for years to use motion capture technology to bring the Total Experience to life. Their collective goal is to make sure the player's play is reactive and that each action affects the outcome of the match. This includes everything from the best and most realistic player animation to the progress bar, in-game crowd and rival players' reaction animations to the tension-filled atmospheres of international matches, such as the 2010 World Cup final between Spain and Germany, and the start of the new season of the Eredivisie in the Netherlands. “We've spent a lot of time perfecting the level of play and capturing the footage needed to make sure the player and ball movements feel as convincing and engaging as possible,” said Mike Rufail, animation director, FIFA. “This year, we've added an extra layer of player control, allowing players to dictate when passes and dribbles are made, and when they turn.” Fan feedback through surveys and polls and innovations such as the new “liked” feature and the new Be A Pro update have all been considered by the game's team of creators. FIFA 22's Take on Football The FIFA development team has been working on the core gameplay features over the past 18 months, refining and improving the movement of players and their interaction with AI clubs. Many of the upgrades are designed to improve the authenticity of the football experience. One of the most exciting new additions is “HyperMotion.” This is the name given to the series of updates to the player animations that would allow for more precise dribbling and shots. The game's team of creators has worked on these features for
