Roblox is a digital platform and game creation system. When you visit the site, you can either create your own game, join and search through user-created games, or even play other people's games. The games are hosted on Roblox.com as either community-run games or on game developers' profiles. Games on Roblox are created using the Roblox Studio software, accessible for free through the website or for a low monthly subscription on Roblox.com. Users can also host community-made games on their personal websites. There are two principal ways to play Roblox games: with a Roblox browser plug-in, or on a Roblox-compatible mobile, tablet or personal computer (PC) device. When games are published, they can be played on all supported platforms. Games on Roblox are coded in the Lua programming language, a language mainly used for making games. You can create your own game, modify and improve other people's games, or play other people's games. Players can gain experience by playing through the game. When players are good enough, they can be promoted to the next level, which awards them extra experience. Once players have earned enough experience, they can become "adults", which allows them to create content. The games on Roblox can be sorted into various categories (e.g. adventure, music, sports, RPGs, and others), with users provided the ability to search specific categories. Roblox users can also restrict certain game types, such as "Action" or "Adventure", to be played on their Roblox accounts. Roblox users can also block other Roblox users from messaging or messaging them. A notable feature of Roblox is its "hot seat" functionality, where a player can invite a certain number of friends to play with them from the same Roblox account, and the player can see how they and their friends are doing, similar to multiplayer online battle arena games. Through the purchase of game boosters, players can increase their stats and earn bonuses, and more advanced purchases provide greater benefits. In August 2015, the Roblox Corporation revealed that it had raised $65.25 million in Series A financing led by IVP, with participation from Y Combinator and Thrive Capital. The company has also raised $200 million in venture capital to date. The picture above was provided by the online store VAP. VAP stands for "Video and Audio"
