The Intel Linux X-Fi driver can be installed using the Auzentech web interface found at this link. If you are using Intel HD audio on a Linux machine, you might want to check out the ALSA Project for more information about the Linux sound API. N.B. The above listing is mostly accurate. It's only wrong is that the default recording device is listed as USB Audio instead of Intel card (which is being added in the listing). The audio quality is much better using USB device since it has a better DAC (digital to analog converter) than Intel card, with its oversampled internal digital to analog converter. The USB device also has SPDIF connection that allows us to record stereo audio with a single mono output (that's what we use). This is far better than Intel card's single mono output and mono digital out. To get a similar result as above, we would need to specify the card parameter (in a comma separated list) to the parameter "dev" in hw:audio,dev=card. For example, to record from the USB device, we would use: My USB audio card (usbaudio) and my PCspeaker(usb-audio) both do not show up in this listing, however my Intel card (ich9) shows up. So, doing an automatic reboot is not recommended, and this is why I have stayed away from the automatic boot since I knew of this. If you do not have multiple audio cards, then this really does not apply to you. Try these steps: For additional information, see the following articles that show how to install the drivers and scripts to enable multimedia capture on Linux.
