The game begins with a map of North America. The player selects either plains or mountains to begin the game. The plains area is mostly uninhabited, and the player's goal is to successfully navigate the party through them while avoiding sickness and starvation. The mountains have a population of Native Americans, called "Indians," which are encountered randomly throughout the game. If the player's party meets an Indian, the player may choose from a set of actions to make him friendly or hostile. If the player is caught by an Indian, that tribe will help the player fight against the others, and their tribe will grow stronger. These attacks may be conducted on every turn, in which case the party will suffer more attacks than usual. However, one of these attacks will cost the player a wagon, which will render the party unable to move until it is repaired. A new character is added to the party each time a wagon is used. The player must also build a fort that can withstand these attacks. The Fort is buildable if the party is large and wilderness is not encountered on the same turn. If the party encounters a large body of water, or gets trapped in a swamp, they will all become malnourished, and the game will end when the player's party is reduced to four or fewer people. The player can encounter a variety of tasks such as finding water sources, hunting animals to eat, building forts and traps, or fighting off predators. The game ends when the player character dies, or when the player is first rescued, and they do not start over. Dying in the game will lead the player to an alternate world, with different animals, crops, weather, and difficulty. If the player loses a wagon in this alternate world, it will also reappear in the original, in which case the player will need to repair it again. If the party survives through both worlds, they may proceed to the next world in the game, having to repair their wagons again.

Judge). The rules are simple to learn. Dirty is a number puzzle game where the player must cross off a number on the board before it reaches a certain number. Players are given a number of moves per level, and at the start of each level a grid is randomly generated. In addition to the level's number of moves, the grid will have a number of dots that the player must cross off. When a number reaches the end of the grid it becomes a matching number, and the player is placed on a new grid with a new number to cross off. Each number can have 1 to 3 matching numbers above, below, or to the left, right, or below, so there are several strategies to using the numbers to create a path that has the fewest number of lines. The gameplay is presented as 2D, so the player must continually switch between the number grid and the cross off board to find the optimal path to cross off the numbers. The game is designed to be easy to learn so beginners can play right away, and is balanced so all levels of skill will be enjoyed by players of all ages.
