History Of Club 33

Any Disney history buff will tell you that the hidden foundations of Walt's classic attractions come from the World's Fair. Club 33 is no exception to this.

The 1964 World's Fair was exceptionally significant for Walt Disney. There, he designed and appeared in a variety of famous experiences like The world isn't a major place, Portage's Magic Skyway, and Great Minutes with Mr. Lincoln for a handful of major corporations.

At the Fair, Walt visited private parlors facilitated by corporate backers, where potential financial backers and other special visitors were welcome to appreciate rewards and engage in an important conversation.

As Disneyland was created, General Electric was set to support the classic attraction, the "Carousel of Progress" — anyway under the condition that Walt built a private parlor inside the park.

Although it was originally expected to be located inside the Carousel of Progress, Walt persuaded chiefs that it would be a prevalent fit inside a new area of the park that was under development: New Orleans Square.

Propelled by the VIP relaxation that Walt Disney originally saw at the 1964 World's Fair, Club 33 Disney World opened in May of 1967 as a private arena inside the park where Walt could entertain important guests.

Over half a century later, the club keeps on having diplomats, celebrities, and corporate agents in an upscale climate.

New Orleans Square, along with Club 33, would be the last land expansion that Walt Disney at any point straightforwardly oversaw.
